SpamMotel is probably one of the most clever anti-spam tools ever concocted. It offers a way to stop unwanted e-mail without the use of filters, which usually either don't work or trash the messages you actually wanted. Instead, SpamMotel works as an on-line service that provides "disposable" e-mail addresses you can use while on the Internet. You'll no longer have to provide your real e-mail address, or enable spammers to share it with their friends.

This is an excellent feature because it'll stop spammers from getting your true address from Usenet, chat rooms and other public places. It also outfoxes harvesting programs that lift e-mail addresses from Web pages. You can even determine how companies use your address for various opt-in services such as newsletters and product registrations.

SpamMotel is probably one of the most clever anti-spam tools ever concocted.

The service's small desktop component is simple to use; just register your primary e-mail address with SpamMotel. Whenever you're asked to supply an e-mail address, enter a reminder such as why and to whom the address is being given. SpamMotel will supply the disposable address, which may automatically be pasted into the requesting company's e-mail form. From then on, SpamMotel will forward resulting messages into your inbox along with the reminder memo.

If you encounter unwanted e-mail, or have discovered that a company is sharing an address without your permission, you can then stop spam in its tracks. Simply go to your on-line log page and suspend messages from a particular disposable address. These messages will not be forwarded to your inbox again unless you resume the address.

SpamMotel isn't the ultimate spam stopper, but it's one of the most unique anti-spam products to be introduced in a long time. If anything, it'll provide a fascinating glimpse into how your address is used on the Internet. SpamMotel is a free service.
